[@bibr42-0269881114543719]). As expected, all the participants with AF diagnosis used more aversive beverages, a finding that has been observed in previous studies ([@bibr2-0269881114543719]; [@bibr29-0269881114543719]; [@bibr31-0269881114543719]). Importantly, we found that only participants with confirmed AF diagnosis used more alcohol in number of doses, and only CR had more of the alcohol they drank in a single occasion when compared with the two other groups. This outcome indicates that the CR group cannot be seen as a merely comparable group to the former as they have a different drinking behaviour as compared with the AF group. In addition, our findings indicate that in particular alcoholic beverages are avoided by the AF group. In the study of [aibr31-0269881114543719] among patients with a lone AF diagnosis, it was proposed that preference for spirits is related to age of alcohol initiation. The present study, however, did not confirm the hypothesis that elderly patients with AF are more likely to start drinking alcohol at a younger age than 648931e174
